GRIEF-WORK
Chapter Four, Rending the Cloth

Helen Kirwan presents her fourth live broadcast performance of grief-work online at performanceartinthevirtual.com on Friday, 9th of April at 6pm BST

Currently artist in residence with the Cyprus Academy of Arts Residency Programme, Kirwan proudly presents the fourth in her new series of online performances to be broadcasted live to a global audience.

Grief-Work is a new development in Kirwan's Memory Theatre series and her direct response to the poignancy of the global pandemic and the new reality which we humans find ourselves in. She has introduced this innovative, virtual approach to the experience of performance art so as to reach out to audiences around the world. During this period of much grief and death, her performances allow a space and time for moments of contemplation.

Kirwan is known for her quiet, meditative performances and moving image installations on the themes of memory and loss; and journeying as a metaphor for loss. Her most recent work exploring these themes, includes her trilogy of videos collectively known as Memory Theatre which were each unveiled at the European Cultural Centre during last three editions of the Venice Biennale.

Grief-Work is part of Kirwan's ongoing inquiry into mourning and loss. During her fourth performance of Grief-Work, Kirwan proposes to simply 'endlessly' tear cloth with her hands. Viewers will become immersed in a compelling, absorbing experience as they watch these seemingly infinite repetitions. Kirwan regards these repetitive tasks and absurd processes as metaphors for the mourning process and as a medium for the metaphorical construction of memory.

Since ancient times, funeral and burial practices in many cultures have involved the practice of tearing cloth and garments as tangible expressions of grief in the face of death. In ancient Greece, Clotho, one of the three fates spun the thread of human fate: her sisters Lachesis dispensed it, and Atropos cut it, thus determining a person's moment of death.

Kirwan's work draws on her own experience of mourning the loss of a loved one. In The Tragedy of Hamlet, Shakespeare powerfully expresses how difficult it is for Hamlet to explain the depths of his personal, singular experience of grief and for others to understand it. 'Grief is a Mouse'[1], hidden and quiet, in Western cultures especially. And yet, as Derrida points out, death takes not only a particular life within the world but each death, each time, will have opened up a world of other deaths in a both finite and infinite way.[2] Kirwan thinks that however difficult, grief needs attention; it's due time and respect especially now when over 2.5 million people have recently died during the pandemic and countless more are in mourning.

The restrictive measures introduced to overcome the pandemic, especially on communication with the sick and dying, have intensified and complicated the experience of grief for many. The basic human need and desire to touch has often been denied completely and being forbidden to touch and hug a dying loved one must be one of the most unutterably painful and poignant features of the pandemic across the globe. Kirwan's performances attempt, if only for fleeting moments, to give grief expression and open up spaces and time for quiet moments for contemplation.

During her residency with the Cyprus Academy of Arts Residency Programme, Kirwan will undertake further performances of Grief-Work, from her studio and on location, bi-weekly until mid-April 2021 and further details will be announced approximately five days before each one.
